

The Duty, Circumstances and Benefits of Baptism: Determined by Evidence (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Duty, Circumstances and Benefits of Baptism: Determined by Evidence

There may be some matters of opinion, wherein a Man may safely suspend his judgement, if he finds them not clearly revealed, or too deep for his understanding or leisure; and may find no difficulties in acting as a good Christian, though he be not fully satisfied about the meaning of some such propositions. But in Baptism, which is a point of Practice, the case is otherwise; it is a thing which either ought to be practised, or it ought not: either Infants should be baptized, or it should be delayd till they grow up: the method also either ought to be by dipping or not. Many such cases might be put, wherein a man who is not satisfied which is right, will be in a great strait, if a case happens wherein he must act either one way or other. It was chiefly on this account that I examined the matter; and in the search I aimed to keep clear of all prejudice, which like an Ignis fatuus is so apt to mislead men; asked of God assistance in my enquiry, and endeavoured to conform my opinion to the evidence, not to reconcile the evidence to my opinion.
