

Freewill or Predestination: The Battle over Saving Grace in Mid- Tudor England (Royal Historical Society Studies in History)

An exploration of the opposition of a Lollard-like group of free-willers to the official teaching of the Edwardian church on predestination... Theirs is a fascinating story... raises some extremely interesting questions about the true nature of the English Church of the period. ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW This study traces the mainstream of early English reaction to the spread of the predestinarian doctrines of the continental reformers which began to dominate England's Protestant leadership during the Edwardian years. Through an examination of both familiar sources and untapped local records, Dr Penny finds a mature alternative to Geneva theology that existed by the reign of Mary Tudor, led by a core of 'freewill' men who, in Lollard fashion, looked to the scriptures in English for their beliefs, rather than to the new ecclesiastical establishment and state officialdom. Dr Penny describes in detail the interaction between radical and reformed and the state of intellectual warfare over election and predestination which developed between them, and sheds additional light on the careers of both freewill leaders and major figures in the main Protestant camp, including the Oxford martyrs. D. ANDREW PENNY is assistant professor of history at The Kings College, Edmonton, Canada.
