Christianity is promoting citizenship rights in China today primarily through invisible and unstructured church communities. Through the pastoral regions culture based on justice- and love-centered Christian ethics, churches and Christians are holding fast to their faith ideology and its application principles, not giving up meeting and worshipping together, popularizing the model of using the law to defend their rights, and influencing church and society. This model has pushed forward the development of civil society in China and facilitated the birth of a new form of church-state relations. To sum up, the model of a constitutional citizenship society and church-state relations, an institutional cultural capital borrowed from the West, is being contextualized well in China through Christianity's new culture movement, and it won't duplicate the absence of a code of ethics in the civil society model in the Western world today.
