

Jacob Boehmes Key To His Thought and Writings

Why a new version of Key, or Clavis, by the Christian mystic Jacob Boehme? So far as I know, this is the first and only version that provides both the English translation and Boehmes original German text. There are 219 sections in the Key and each section is presented with the English translation and then the German text immediately below. To give a short example, here is section 188: God is the eternal, immense, incomprehensible Unity, which manifests itself in itself, from eternity in eternity, by the Trinity; and is Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in a threefold working. Gott ist die ewige, unermeßliche, unfaßliche Einheit, der offenbaret sich in sich selber von Ewigkeit in Ewigkeit, mit der Dreiheit, und ist ein Vater, Sohn und H. Geist in dreierlei Wirkungen. The English translation follows the 1647 edition by John Sparrow but with an updating of archaic verb forms e.g., desires for desireth and several other changes. These changes include alternative translations of words, the translation of some clauses and sentences that Sparrow does not translate, and the use of gender-neutral language. I have also included most, but not all, of Sparrows annotations, and added 75 or so annotations of my own that are either new or amplifications of those by Sparrow. To supplement the annotations, a Glossary provides a fuller discussion of some of Boehmes key terms, such as Einfaltlichkeit or contraction. Of especial note: four sections that are missing in Sparrow appear here for the first time, with both the original German and my translation. One of them shimmers with lapidary light: The sacred ternary, or Holy Threeness, is the internal heavenly working power in substance, wherein the Trinity of God works. The German text is from Gichtels 1730 edition of Boehmes work. Whereas Sparrows English translation has 219 sections, the Gichtel edition has 147, the standard number for all German editions. To enable readers to see the German text in its standard format, I have juxtaposed the 1715 and 1730 editions, section by section, and added this to the book. Boehmes Clavis, or Key, auf Deutsch, is online at several sites, but in all the sites I found, each page is an image or picture of a page and not actual text. Since I wanted editable text for this project, this required that I manually type the entire text, word for word, and line for line. I did this by placing the online image of a page on the left side of my monitor, and an open Microsoft Word document on the right. Therefore, my version provides the actual German text and not images of text. Since Jacob Boehmes writings flow from the wellspring of his spiritual illumination in 1600, I will close with my translation of his description of this crucial turning point in his life: In these my earnest searchings and desires, the gate so opened before me, that in one quarter of an hour I saw and understood more than I would have in many years at a university. Whereupon I was so radically amazed, not knowing how this happened to me, that I turned my heart to God in praise.

For I saw and understood the Being of all beings, the ground and that which has no ground, the birth of the Holy Trinity, the origin and coming forth of this world, and all creatures, through the divine wisdom. I understood, and saw, within my own self, all three worlds; namely, (1) the divine, angelical or paradisiacal world; and (2) the dark world, that is, the origin of Nature in Fire; and (3) this outward, visible world, as creation and out-birthing, or as a substance spoken forth from the two inward spiritual worlds. And not only was I full of wonder at all this, but also filled with joy.
