Not illustrated. 1900 Excerpt: ... wish I had begun it before. It reminds me of a kind of medicine for colds that you used to make for me, madam, when I first came to the canal-boat. It had lemons and sugar in it, and it was so good, I remember I used to think that I would like to go into a lingering consumption, so that I could have it three times a day, until I finally passed away like a lily on a snowbank. Jones been going about a good deal in a bath-chair, and doesnt mind my walking alongside of him. He says it makes him feel easier in his mind, on the whole. Mr. Poplington came two or three days ago, and he is stopping at our hotel. We three have hired a carriage together two or three times, and have taken drives into the country. Once we went to an inn, the Cat and Fiddle, about five miles away, on a high bit of ground called Axe Edge. It is said to be the highest tavern in England, and its lucky that it is, for thats the only recommendation its got. The sign in front of the house has on it a cat on its hind legs playing a fiddle, with a look on its face as if it was saying, Its pretty poor, but its the best I can do for you. Inside is another painting of a cat playing a fiddle, and truly that one might be saying, Ha, ha! You thought that that picture on the sign was the worst picture you ever saw in your life, but now you see how you are mistaken. Up on that high place you get the rain fresher than you do in Buxton, because it hasnt gone so far through the air, and its mixed with more chilly winds than anywhere else in England, I should say. But everybody is bound to go to the Cat and Fiddle at least once, and we are glad we have been there, and that it is over. I like the places near the town a great deal better, and some of them are very...
