Excerpt: ... CHAPTER I OUR FIRST NATIONAL ROAD The middle ages had their wars and agonies, but also their intense delights. Their gold was dashed with blood, but ours is sprinkled with dust. Their life was intermingled with white and purple; ours is one seamless stuff of brown.--Ruskin. A PERSON cannot live in the American Central West and be acquainted with the generation which greets the new century with feeble hand and dimmed eye, without realizing that there has been a time which, compared with today, seems as the Middle Ages did to the England for which Ruskin wrote--when life was intermingled with white and purple. This western boy, born to a feeble republic-mother, with exceeding suffering in those days which tried mens souls, grew up as all boys grow up. For a long and doubtful period the young West grew slowly and changed appearance gradually. Then, suddenly, it started from its slumbering, and, in two decades, could hardly have been recognized as the infant which, in 1787, looked forward to a precarious and doubtful future. The boy has grown into the man in the century, but the changes of the last half century are not, perhaps, so marked as those of the first, when a wilderness was suddenly transformed into a number of imperial commonwealths. r When this West was in its teens and began suddenly outstripping itself, to the marvel of the world, one of the momentous factors in its progress was the building of a great national road, from the Potomac River to the Mississippi River, by the United States Government--a highway seven hundred miles in length, at a cost of seven millions of treasure. This ribbon of road, winding its way through Maryland,

Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, toward the Mississippi, was one of the most important steps in that...
