Not illustrated. 1914 Excerpt: ...implications of His sayings. He nowhere systematized His conceptions of wealth and its right uses; and we can do so only by continual reference from the particular cases with which He dealt to the general conditions which coloured all His thinking. The total wealth of the society in which he lived was far less than that of the society in which we live. Professor Patten tells us that we must distinguish between a condition of social deficit, in which there is hardly sufficient wealth, if properly distributed, to maintain all the population in a tolerable degree of comfort; and a condition of social plenty, in which the total wealth is sufficient to maintain all in decency and afford to all a chance to share in the higher values of life, though this desirable end may, of course, be defeated, even in a state of abundance, by inequitable distribution. Corresponding to the condition of social deficit there is a pain economy. Life for the great masses of the people is hard and bare and shadowed by continual want or the danger of starvation. Suffering and hardship abound, and are so common that the finer sensibilities of men have but little opportunity to develop. Men are less humane, and pity is rare. Cruelty, or what seems cruelty to those who live under different social conditions, is often practiced and does not so promptly or so generally call forth condemnation. On the other hand, a condition of plenty introduces a pleasure economy. Life becomes easier; comforts multiply and are brought within the reach of an ever larger proportion of the people. Men become less accustomed to hardship, want and pain, of the physical kind at least. Under these milder conditions of life the sensibilities become refined.
