Three slaves on a relatively benevolently-run Plantation in the Carolinas in 1775 with different personalities and different aspirations come to grips with a word that was floating around which was easy to say or write down, but harder to really understand---Freedom. Hector is a master horse-trainer who has a questioning mind but one that knows the limits of what can be asked. He is in love with Athena, a highly-educated House Nigger whose goddess-like beauty is matched by her advanced literary intellect, very much valued in the Big House by a benevolent White Master, and his wife. Hercules is the smallest Colored field hand on the Plantation, but the one who works hardest and who has the most open and vulnerable heart. Their highly-educated and intelligent Jeffersonian-like owner with a dark and hidden past, Horatio Johnson, III, takes on the Cause of Liberty by taking arms against King George, inviting his Colored Wards to join them. But, through a series of accidents, his three most favored Negroid Americans wind up on different sides of the War, one of those being aggressively neutral, reflecting the reality that nearly as many Black Americans fought for King George in pursuit of Freedom and Liberty for all as those who served under slave-owning Founding Fathers such as Washington. Everyone on the Johnson Plantation comes fact to face with the ideal of Freedom, but have to somehow intermingle that aspiration with survival, honor and familial obligations which go very deep, in a conflict that pulls in every member of Colonel Horatios wife and daughter as well. Their fates ultimately connect as the War continues, revealing secret things done in the past as well as hidden potentials for both good and evil which all converge head on in a winner take all struggle that changes them and the country they live in forever.
