

The Slubgob Letters: The Correspondences of a Teaching Devil to a Post-Graduate Student Woodworm On the Master Plan for the Churches

From the time of the fall of man, when The Creator first announced his auspicious plan to remediate the effects of that fatal lapse, the spiritual nemesis of mankind had been at work to unseat the life of God from the soul of man. Fast-forward several millennia. In 1940, a particularly insightful writer and avowed opponent of that nemesis one C.S. Lewis managed to intercept some of the correspondences between one of the Devil's minions called Screwtape to a junior devil called Wormwood. These letters revealed a nefarious plan to tempt and ultimately to destroy just one of the objects of God's saving grace. Spoiler alert they failed! Now, the Devil and his agents had to start from scratch. Not wishing to be outdone for having failed to snuff out their selected Christian rat, the Enemy hatched an even grander plan. This time he would go after the nests, that is the churches! The selected stratagem was to stir up so much dissension and division, that the unifying ligature of God's Church, which is the secret of its power, would be broken down, thereby exposing the rats themselves to error and apostasy. The Slubgob Letters, named for Lewis Head of the Tempters Training College, contains the correspondences between Slubgob and his trainee Woodworm, disclosing the details of this new master-plan to eat away at the structure of the churches, and thus, to destroy both the vermin and their revered institution. No spoiler alert here. Read the book!
