

The Unfastened Heart

There's something magical about this novel, and not just because its heroine is a mystic and a healer of broken hearts. No, the magic is more than the content; it's as though the lilt of von Herzen's prose generates alpha waves. As soon as you start reading, you're soothed, suffused with both tenderness and an expectant alertness. The novel takes you into a verdant world of flowering trees, songbirds, fresh baked bread, statues of saints and women. These are the Cordojo women, a group of friends united by the nurturing guidance of Anna de la Senda. Anna lives for love, that is, she helps people cope with the anguish and confusion that love and its absence bring, in spite of the fact that she hasn't loved a man since her husband left her and their ethereally beautiful daughter, Mariela, a dozen years ago. Now 18, Mariela is consumed with desire for her black-haired and poetic neighbor, Addison. As their love flourishes, Anna and Addison's widowed father gravitate toward each other, and soon trouble and passion surge into their lives like a summer flood. Every character and every scene in this romantic, funny, creative, suspenseful, and enchanted novel is compelling, and every sentence is wrought with grace, perception and lyricism. -- Donna Seaman -- Booklist
